George H Peroin (Jr),DEFENSE SYSTEMS MANAGEMENT SCHOOL FORT BELVOIR VA.,1976 While the use of interactive graphics is fairly well established in the scientific field managerial applications are still in an embryonic stage of development Two reasons for this became apparent First there has been a general reluctance on the part of managers themselves to become involved in the design of application software Second the cost of most computer systems has been too high in the past to allow for the acquisition of unproven computer capabilities in the budgets of all but the largest companies Research results also indicate that the computer industry is placing its emphasis on improvements in hardware technology rather than on software design Marketing brochures underscore the widespread availability of equipment and a disheartening lack of commercially available business application software Until management becomes convinced that interactive graphics capabilities can be a practical and economical aid to decision making and becomes involved in the development of software packages we will not see rapid and widespread growth in this area
