INTRODUCTION

Bees are the most economically valuable pollinators of different agricultural crops in the entire world (Great Britain: Department for Environment, 2011). Besides the production of honey, bees also play a significant role in crop pollination which is a vital element in agriculture, and food production (Stephen L. Buchmann, 1997). According to researchers, bees accomplish approximately 80% of all insect pollination (Keith S. Delaplane, 2016). Consequently, world food supply depends on the well-being of bees. Recent researches have shown that the rates of honey bee losses are increasing drastically, meaning that little is done to counter the problem of honey bee losses in the entire world. Therefore, proper mechanisms must be established to address this problem before it gets out of control, affecting severely the life of all living organisms on Earth.
