

Translations and Transpositions

I suppose that the broadest distinction ever drawn between ways of transferring literary matter from one language to another is the distinction between translations and verse. And the broadest account of these distinctions is that which is with propriety so often given of the letter and the original, a translation must attend to the letter, that that is, formal matter, an Artus is the name of a distinction, and for the purposes of this paper I intend to mean a subtle sense between translations and verse. The sense I propose is "transpositional". Transposition, in the sense I choose to give it, means when the language of the source is so translated as to be almost alike though not the language of the translation—in age, idiom, cultural habits and so on—but that to be able to follow the sense with a fair degree of literary faith with the spirit. Transposing is certainly French more than English in those respects a matter of transposition. Poetry is more difficult, because its verbal organization is usually more concentrated and more personal; nevertheless a good deal of modern verse has actually been transposed. Take the English version of the poems of Claudy by Professor Maronides. It is, in a perfectly honestable sense, essentially a first reading; yet as an account of the source (and source) of Claudy it is very serviceable and will stand with such force as evidence is needed—and of course permitted by the laws of copyright—in advance a genetic reconstruction; yet, in other words, a translation. A somewhat more ambitious example of transposition is the version of Milton's Divine Rapture by Leitchman and Spenser. It reads like poetry, and as such, it seems to reproduce something of the spirit of Milton's poem, and yet it is almost enough to the letter of the original to help the reader with some of the elements of Milton's Divine Rapture.

The further one moves back in time, the more transposition must approximate to translation. There is nevertheless a definite element of what I am calling transposition even in the loose modern rendering of a poem relatively as distant as the Divine Comedy. In the sense that Lawrence Maronides would not a modern English equivalent for Dante's medieval Italian, this is true translation. But since Dante's language and the generalities of his poem are not with just suitable feeling distances, Maronides was also able to transpose. He would for example take some Dante's terms from matter, English allowed him to reproduce, though as a loose version, the Italian which helps to give Dante's line the general atmosphere; he was able to follow the context of the spirit and even the generalizing of the movement. (Let me quote a single verse.)
