Literacy and numeracy support for homeless adults: An exploration of third sector employment and skills provision

Katy Jones, July 2018

Summary

Whilst homeless people are increasingly expected to move into work, many face a number of barriers to labour market participation. A small but growing evidence base suggests that one key barrier is poor literacy and numeracy, or 'basic' skills. This briefing note summarises research focused on the literacy and numeracy support offered by third sector organisations, as part of their efforts to help homeless adults move into (or closer to) work. It presents key findings from 27 qualitative interviews conducted with staff working in the Greater Manchester homelessness sector. The research uncovers the extent and nature of literacy and numeracy provision offered in these organisations, along with a range of factors shaping it. It shows that organisations have demonstrated a propensity to develop literacy and numeracy support. However, it concludes that while government policy and related funding does not recognise and support such provision, it is likely to remain piecemeal and highly contingent on the contribution of volunteers and short term funding opportunities.
