

free will and moral responsibility

free will and moral responsibility, also called problem of moral responsibility, the problem of reconciling the belief that people are morally responsible for what they do with the apparent fact that humans do not have free will because their actions are causally determined. It is an ancient and enduring philosophical puzzle.

Freedom and responsibility

Historically, most proposed solutions to the problem of free will and moral responsibility have attempted to establish that humans do have free will. But what does free will consist of? When people make decisions or perform actions, they usually feel as though they are choosing or acting freely. A person may decide, for example, to buy apples instead of oranges, to vacation in France rather than in Italy, or to call a sister in Nebraska instead of a brother in Florida. On the other hand, there are at least some situations in which people seem not to act freely, as when they are physically coerced or mentally or emotionally manipulated. One way to formalize the intuitive idea of free action is to say that people act freely if it is true that they could have acted otherwise. Buying apples is ordinarily a free action because in ordinary circumstances one can buy oranges instead; nothing forces one to buy apples or prevents one from buying oranges.

Yet the decisions people make are the result of their desires, and their desires are determined by their circumstances, past experiences, and psychological and personality traits—their dispositions, tastes, temperaments, levels of intelligence, and so on. Circumstances, experiences, and traits in this sense are obviously the result of many factors outside the individual's control, including upbringing and perhaps even genetic makeup. If this is correct, then one's actions may ultimately be no more the result of free will than one's eye colour is.

The existence of free will seems to be presupposed by the notion of moral responsibility. Most people would agree that one cannot be morally responsible for actions that one could not help but perform. Moreover, moral praise and blame, or reward and punishment, seem to make sense only on the assumption that the agent in question is morally responsible.
