Abstract

Introduction Since the widespread adoption of laparoscopic techniques in biliary surgery, the incidence of bile duct injuries (BDI) has not significantly declined despite increased operative experience and recognition of the critical view of safety (CVS) method for anatomic identification. We hypothesized that operative approaches in clinical practice may vary from well-described technical recommendations. The objective of this study was to assess how practicing surgeons commonly identify anatomy during laparoscopic cholecystectomy (LC).

Methods We performed a cohort study assessing practices in biliary surgery among current practicing surgeons. Surgeons belonging to the Midwest Surgical Association and the Society of American Gastrointestinal and Endoscopic Surgeons were surveyed. Items surveyed include preferred methods for cystic duct identification, recognition of the CVS, and use of intraoperative imaging.

Results In total, 374 of 849 surgeons responded. The CVS was not correctly identified by 75 % of surgeons descriptively and by 21 % of surgeons visually. 56 % of surgeons practiced the infundibular method for identification of the cystic duct; 27 % practiced the CVS method. Intraoperative cholangiography was used by 16 % and laparoscopic ultrasound by <1 %.

Conclusion A majority of surgeons preferably do not use the CVS method of identification during LC. A large percentage of practicing surgeons are unable to describe or visually identify the CVS. These results suggest an urgent need to reexamine the tenets of how LC is being taught and disseminated and present a clear target for improvement to reduce BDI.

Laparoscopic cholecystectomy has been shown in multiple studies to be superior to open cholecystectomy in the routine treatment of many forms of biliary disease [1–6]. This has led to the National Institute of Health announcing laparoscopic cholecystectomy as the gold-standard operation in 1993 [7]. Since the widespread acceptance of the laparoscopic technique in biliary surgery, the incidence of bile duct injuries (BDI) remains 0.4 %, compared to 0.2 % in open operation [8]. This, despite, improved instrumentation, refined techniques, and incorporation into surgical resident training. An estimated 3000 BDI occur annually in the USA alone as a consequence of cholecystectomy. Adherence to a strict set of principles for discerning ductal and vascular anatomy during laparoscopic cholecystectomy is paramount in avoiding injury due to misidentification. These principles were articulated by Strasberg et al. [9] in 1995 and are collectively known as the critical view of safety (CVS). The CVS is recognized by many biliary surgeons as best practice and is the method of identification used to trained surgical residents. There have been four published series comprising 4500 patients in which the CVS was explicitly used during LC with resulting low BDI rate (0–0.03 %) [10–13]. In addition, a Japanese review
