

“The Devil and all His Works”

By J. STAFFORD WIGGINT

THE solemn annihilation of the devil and all his works has been omitted from the proposed new Catechism. The omission has been taken to indicate a disbelief in the existence of the devil, and presumably of evil spirits also; and indeed no other explanation is possible. It makes one a little frightened about future revisions of other parts of the Prayer Book and Articles. On the one hand there is the tendency to reinstate beliefs that were rejected at the Reformation as unscriptural, and on the other hand the tendency to repudiate scriptural teachings that have always formed an essential part of reformed and unreformed Church teaching, as in the case before us. Even if some theologians are agnostic about the devil, or actually “adiaboleitic”, it is a serious breach of trust to impose their private judgment, even negatively, upon an official statement of Church teaching such as the Catechism. Private judgments tend to be ephemeral.

One generally assumes that disbelief in a personal devil is a modern phenomenon. Certainly Rudolf Bultmann treats it as this, when he uses his delightful new metaphorical argument in his essay in Kerygma and Myth (p. 5): “It is impossible to see electric light and the wireless and to avoid ourselves of modern medical and surgical discoveries, and at the same time to believe in the New Testament world of demons and spirits”. Since Bultmann wrote this, we have met a similar type of argument, that space- and artificial satellites have made it impossible for us to believe in God. It is true that modern thinking has been the compelling factor in the minds of the revisers of the Catechism, but the issue was there at the Reformation, since Calvin writes: “Having above related that vulgar philosophy concerning the holy angels, which teaches that they are nothing but good notions or inspirations which God excites in the minds of men, we must here likewise refute those who foolishly allege that devils are nothing but bad affections or perturbations suggested by our carnal nature” (Institutes, I. xiv. 19, Beveridge’s translation).

Erasmus Swendenborg, who claimed to have visions of the worlds of heaven and hell, maintained that angels and evil spirits are not any separate creation, but are men and women who have lived on this earth. The Devil is then a name given to a certain sphere of existence, and is not a personal spirit. “Hell taken as a whole is what is called the Devil and Satan. The hell which is behind, where dwell those called evil geni, is called the Devil; and the hell which is in front, where dwell those called evil spirits, is called Satan.” (Heaven and Hell, published 1798; Everyman Edn., Section 513.) It is interesting to note Swendenborg’s explanation, in the same passage, that “the Christian world has formed an erroneous belief respecting the inhabitants of heaven and hell from certain passages of the Word, understood according to the sense of the letter only, and not illustrated and explained by genuine doctrine from the Word; for the literal sense of
