ABSTRACT

In psychiatric diagnosis, a contemporary data-driven, manual-based method for mental disorders classification is the most popular technique; however, it has several inevitable flaws. Using the three-way decision as a framework, we propose a unified model that stands for clinicians' subjective approach (CSA) analysis consisting of three parts: qualitative analysis, quantitative analysis, and evaluation-based analysis. A ranking list and a set of numerical weights based on illness magnitude levels according to the clinician's greatest degree of assumptions are the findings of the qualitative and quantitative investigation. We further create a comparative classification of illnesses into three groups with varying important levels; a three-way evaluation-based model is utilized in this study for the aim of understanding and portraying these results in a more clear way. This proposed method might be integrated with the manual-based process as a complementary tool to improve precision while diagnosing mental disorders..

More often these recognized tools, such as DSM-5 [7] and ICD-11 [8], fails to distinguish between the proper and correct disorder diagnosis of a complex phenomenon in individual cases. Patients with the same disorder exhibit diverse symptom profiles during diagnosis [35] and comorbidities or co-occurring conditions creating numerous clinical and research challenges as well
