The Piercing Christine Garren,2006-09-01 The Piercing celebrates the here and now while endorsing a deep faith in the necessity of the imagination In response to life in a literal world Christine Garren s lyric poems ignite belief in exhilaration Ordinary settings a park a pond a littered vacant lot an attic room through Garren s eyes reveal something extraordinary For example in February Snow the poet surveys a winter scene through the windows of various rooms and reflects how Sometimes it is beautiful in some of the minutes then ordinary again that feeling of air in the midst of burial In The Well she writes of reaching an impasse in a relationship The exhilarating life is finished We must accept it this late afternoon and move back into the rational world Spare quiet visual distillations of the physical and emotional dimensions of the moment define The Piercing with a driving energy at once delicate and fierce Small piercing as if in the earlobe your leaving caused Air is filling it now time fills it the view through these windows fills the tiny hole The people on the street the manic father the other father carrying his child in pink this millimeter s width opening is for a decade to fit through Look there you go There I go there our landscape goes as if through a fantastical roof s hole the shingle pulled off the nail off our death is flying over the city The Piercing
