

Some Postwar Problems of the Secondary School*

CHARLES W. BOARDMAN

Professor of Education, University of Minnesota, Minneapolis

ALTHOUGH aware that there were problems which it would have to face when peace came, during the war the primary concern of the secondary school has been the contribution which it could make to the war effort and the solution of immediate and pressing problems arising out of the impact of the war upon it and the youth attending it. This is an immediate problem which the high school must prepare to meet, not only by using its own resources for guidance, but by establishing contact with the nearest center of the Veterans Administration for information and further assistance.

The demand by veterans for further education at the secondary or lower level is steadily growing. This group includes high-school graduates who want special courses so they may enter technical colleges, others desiring refresher courses, many who are seeking some form of vocational education, and non-
