Anthropology and Development Jean-Pierre Oliver De-Sardan,2008-02-29 This book re establishes the relevance of mainstream anthropological and sociological approaches to development processes and simultaneously recognizes that contemporary development ought to be anthropology's principal area of study Professor de Sardar argues for a socio anthropology of change and development that is a deeply empirical multidimensional diachronic study of social groups and their interactions The Introduction provides a thought provoking examination of the principal new approaches that have emerged in the discipline during the 1990s Part I then makes clear the complexity of social change and development and the ways in which socio anthropology can measure up to the challenge of this complexity Part II looks more closely at some of the leading variables involved in the development process including relations of production the logics of social action the nature of knowledge forms of mediation and political strategies

The Politics of Representation in Anthropological Theory with Reference to Fieldwork in South India Margaret George-Cramer, 1995 Myopic Development and Cultural Lens Sukant Kumar Chaudhury, 1993 The term development has generated considerable academic interest and unending debate among scholars from several disciplines At a time when the intellectual climate is marked by a lack of consensus on the term this book sets forth a modified model of development at the micro level a model in which culture is placed on the highest pedestal and evaluation provides the key to success The book is the result of an in-depth fieldwork carried out by the author among the Konds of Phullbani district of Orissa The target oriented approach of the government agencies has made them over inclined towards statistics in the formulation and implementation of development programmes neglecting the socio cultural factors This has resulted in a myopic development the government's offer in terms of development the government's offer in terms of developmental assistance has either been rejected or at best evoked lukewarm response The author proposes that the planners must use a cultural lens to devise development programmes otherwise development would continue to be myopic

Antiquity to Modernity in Tribal India: Continuity and change among Indian tribes, 1998 Outcome of a project undertaken by the Indian Council of Social Science Research in 1989 with financial support from the Ministry of Rural Development under the guidance of S C Dube

International Social Science Journal, 1997 Planned Change Elizabeth Colson, 1988 This paper was first delivered as the Bernard Memorial Lecture at the University of California Berkeley The author a distinguished anthropologist begins by examining the multinational development community and its relationship or lack thereof with Third World communities In her search for understanding the fact that the record of international assistance in the Third World is anything but satisfactory the author traces her own involvement with voluntary aid programs since 1946 and the various trends that appeared and disappeared Her first point is that there are fundamental differences between rural people and development workers about the assumptions behind the meaning of development She gives several examples to show that local people and foreign assistance personnel work often at cross purposes For example she states that development personnel frequently look to self help schemes to provide the impetus for an infrastructure believing that once people see the advantages gained from working together they will move forward progressively this turns out to be wishful thinking One of the most striking discoveries she made in the course of a study for the Berkeley Decentralization Project was that much of this information was already known to members of the development community and that knowing it made no difference since this knowledge goes against the working premises of the development community and interferes with existing career patterns Examples are given to show that social scientists who are hired are expected to tailor advice so it integrates with the prevailing mode of operation of the agency that employs them The development community is thus seen as a well entrenched community which functions like any other bureaucracy insuring itself against rapid change The author shows how the spread of consensus among the various agencies is the result of a close knit international network that transcends the boundaries of the voluntary bilateral and multilateral agencies Her conclusion is that the result of most of the activities of the development community revolve around the community itself and are far removed from hunger poverty and despair of so many people in the countries that receive aid
