Byrd,1984 The first of these two studies analyzes the effect of economic reforms and adjustment policies on a consumer durables producer in 1980 82 The incentives created by reforms are analyzed with particular attention to the interaction between changes in incentives and changes in market conditions The main conclusions are that the dominant influence has been the market external controls have been weak and manipulatable labor allocation remains the most unreformed part of the system and the use of bank loans to finance investment has loosened financial discipline The seller s market was transformed into a buyer s market before the reforms could achieve their aims The second study analyzes the effect of adjustment and reform policies on a medium sized machinery producer This factory was given financial incentives and made responsible for sales at the same time that demand for its products fell sharply The enterprise responded by initiating an economic responsibility system of management making an intensive sales effort changing its product mix and attempting to improve quality and diversify its products Conflicting directives an unreformed labor and wage system and price controls limited the performance that might have been achieved
