Classification Of Birds:

Bird book Mauris,2020-07-18 It may not seem important to specifically define the general term bird but in doing so every birder can gain a greater appreciation of the animals they love to watch By understanding the similarities all birds share we can better notice appreciate and enjoy the individual characteristics that make each bird species unique When we notice those differences more easily we become better birders and are well on our way to seeing hundreds or thousands of the world s unique bird species All birds are classified as members of the Kindom Animalia Phylum Chordata and Class Aves While this may seem to be an arbitrary artificial classification this general grouping emphasizes that birds are related through many of the characteristics they share including Vertebrates All birds have a backbone which places them in the Phylum Chordata Unlike most other vertebrates however birds have a lighter skeletal structure filled with hollows gaps and air sacs to keep birds lightweight so they can fly more efficiently Feathers All birds have evolved feathers composed of keratin and other proteins and light reflecting pigments to serve as body insulation Different types of feathers may also be ornamental such as plumes crests or streamers Other feather types help birds control their flight while some feathers such as down are strictly for insulation Wings Wings are one of the most defining characteristics of birds Even flightless birds have vestigial or adapted wings or flippers they may use for swimming threat displays or courtship dances The size and shape of wings vary between species based on how the bird flies and wing markings are useful to identify bird species Bill All birds have a bony keratin covered projection forming their mouth This bill is frequently evolved for specific bird diet types and many birds also use their bills as tools for carrying drumming drilling preening and other tasks Some birds even use their bills as weapons or to help regulate body temperature Warm blooded All birds are endothermic which means they generate their own internal body heat and do not rely exclusively on their environment to maintain their temperature While many birds will sun themselves to help regulate their temperature sunning has more than one purpose and is not solely for body temperature maintenance High metabolism Birds have a high efficient metabolism that quickly turns food into usable energy They have a four chambered heart and high respiratory rate as well which helps them be efficient and agile fliers as well as maintain their high body temperatures Bipedal All birds have two legs used for perching walking hopping or running Different types of birds have evolved different leg shapes and lengths to suit their needs For example wading birds have thin long legs suitable for moving through deeper water while raptors have thicker more powerful legs for capturing prey Furcula Though not visible to birders every bird has a furcula or wishbone that protects the chest cavity during wing beats This keeps the bird s chest organs safe from excessive pressure as the wings move and birds change altitude Egg laying All birds lay amniotic eggs as part of their reproductive cycle The eggs have a hard shell and require incubation to continue development until hatching Egg size shape and markings vary for each species as does the number of eggs laid necessary incubation time and the condition of the chicks at hatching Communication Birds have highly developed communication skills and many bird species communicate vocally through elaborate songs and calls Nonverbal bird sounds are also part of their communication abilities For many species extensive communication is part of courtship behavior territorial defense parent chick recognition and community cooperation
