

Central and Eastern Europe Transition to a Market Economy The Role of the Government

Transition to a market economy in Central and Eastern Europe (CEE) has been a complex and multi-faceted process. The role of the government has been crucial in this process, particularly in the early stages. The government has been responsible for creating a legal and institutional framework for a market economy, as well as for providing social safety nets and addressing the challenges of unemployment and poverty. The transition has been characterized by a period of economic shock, followed by a period of gradual reform and growth. The government's role has been to guide this process, ensuring that the transition is as smooth and equitable as possible. This has involved a combination of top-down reforms and bottom-up initiatives, with the government playing a central role in both. The transition has also been influenced by international organizations and donor countries, which have provided technical assistance and financial support. The government's role has been to coordinate these efforts and ensure that they are aligned with the country's needs and objectives. The transition has been a long and difficult process, but it has led to significant economic and social progress in CEE. The government's role has been essential in this process, and it will continue to be important in the future.
