

Critical reviews

Why should I write critical reviews?

Writing critical reviews at uni gives you practice in carefully reading and analysing a specialised text and communicating your evaluation of it clearly and convincingly.

In many professional contexts, you'll need to be able to read and understand specialised texts. You'll also need to be able to evaluate them and explain your evaluation of them. Other people can then use your review to decide whether the text is relevant and helpful for their purposes.

Professional texts you might have to evaluate include:
lesson plans, technical reports, policies, syllabi, case reports, research reports.

What's a critical review?

The purpose of a critical review is to summarise and evaluate a text and provide a recommendation based on your evaluation. It usually focuses on a single text (e.g. a book, journal article, or government report), but occasionally you may be asked to review 2 or 3 texts.

What's in a critical review?

A critical review usually includes the following parts:

Summary

- What is the text about? What is the aim of the text?

Critical analysis & evaluation

- Both positive and negative evaluations, e.g. What does the text contribute to the field? What are the limitations of the writer's approach/conclusions?

Recommendation

- In light of your analysis and evaluation, how should others view this text? What are the practical implications of the research?

Example

Consider the following online review of a food delivery service. Maybe you have written something similar before.

Terrible service

¹I ordered from a shop that's a 5 minute walk down the road. ²I couldn't go as I'm at work but needed lunch. ³Order status has been "being prepared" for the past hour and a half with no option to cancel my order. ⁴Food arrived 2 hours later cold and hard. ⁵Do not recommend.

The example above has the same three main parts:

- Sentences 1-2: a summary of the person's experience using the service (what happened)
