Journals

Journals consist of many articles. They are typically written by scholars in a specific field. Some journals are peer-reviewed, which means other scholars/experts in the field review the article to determine whether or not it should be published. Articles in journals can cover very specific topics or narrow fields of research.

- when doing scholarly research
- to find out what has been studied on your topic
- to find bibliographies that point to other relevant research

Newspapers

Newspapers are generally published daily and cover a variety of subjects. The information in the articles within a newspaper covers current events and topics relevant to a specific city. They also include national and international news.

- to find current information about international, national, and local events.
- to find editorials, commentaries, expert or popular opinions.

Books

Books cover virtually any topic, fact or fiction. For research purposes, you will probably be looking for books that synthesize all the information on one topic to support a particular argument or thesis. Academic libraries usually organize and store their book collections on shelves called "stacks" that are grouped by subject.

- when looking for lots of information on a topic
- to put your topics in context with other important issues
- to find historical information
- to find summaries of research to support an argument

Encyclopedias

Encyclopedias are collections of short, factual entries often written by different contributors who are knowledgeable about the topic. There are two types of encyclopedias: general and subject. General encyclopedias provide concise overviews on a wide variety of topics. Subject encyclopedias contain in-depth entries focusing on one field of study.

- when looking for background information on a topic
- when trying to find key ideas, important dates, or concepts
