The Organizational Implications of Creativity Ricard Gil,Pablo Tomas Spiller,2007 We develop a basic framework to understand the organization of highly creative activities Management faces a fundamental tradeoff in organizing such activities On the one hand since creativity cannot be achieved by command and control or by monetary incentives internal contractual production of creative products is plagued by hazards arising from their fundamental characteristics extremely high input output and market uncertainty and the inherent informational advantages of creative talent Procuring highly creative products in the market place though exposes the distributor to a fundamental risk independently produced creative goods are generic distribution wise Thus in procuring creative products in the marketplace distributors face the unavoidable winner s curse risk Since this risk is to a large extent independent of the creative nature of the product the higher the creative content the higher the relative hazards associated with internal or contractual production Thus internal contractual production of creative goods will tend to be less prevalent the higher the creative content associated with its production We apply this insight to the evolution of the U S film industry in the mid XXth century We exploit two simultaneous natural experiments the diffusion of TV and the Paramount antitrust decision forcing the separation of exhibitors from distributors and prohibiting the use of block booking Both events increased the demand for creative content in movies We develop empirical implications which we test by analyzing in detail the decision by distributors to produce films internally or to procure them in the market place in the face of an increase in the demand for creative content
