Major differences in the distribution of the world's population are a result of the unequal distribution of resources and the unequal distribution of technology. The world's population is concentrated in the developed countries, which have the most resources and technology.

A major cause of the world's population growth is the increase in the number of people who are able to survive. This is due to the development of agriculture and the invention of the printing press, which allowed for the spread of knowledge and the development of new technologies.

The world's population is growing rapidly, and this is a major concern for the future. The world's population is expected to reach 9 billion by the year 2050, and this will have a major impact on the world's resources and the environment.
