Some First Steps in Human Progress The word anthropology from its derivation means of course a discourse concerning man
It has been defined by the great French naturalist De Quatrefages as the natural history of man It is then scientific study of man of the same sort as the scientific study which a botanist pursues concerning plants and the zoologist concerning animals In its most comprehensive meaning it includes the study of the physical man and of his mental social and religious natures It is a broad field not easily limited It includes a number of subordinate sciences such as somatology or physical anthropology ethnology prehistoric archaeology and culture history It is not the intention of the author in writing this book to discuss the whole field of anthropology but simply to consider some points in culture history It shall be our aim to trace simply some few of the first steps in human progress Primitive man whatever his capacity for learning and achievement faced an unknown world He was to subdue nature to do so he must solve many problems If we look at the great progress and advancement which we in America have made within one hundred years we may see how the solution of one problem aids to solve a new problem how the ground gained to day serves simply as a point from which to advance to occupy new ground to morrow This progress is now marked and rapid when it began it was slow and feeble A part of this book was originally presented in the form of lectures to a Chautauqua audience About the Publisher Forgotten Books publishes hundreds of thousands of rare and
