Developing Intercultural Competence Through Online English Language Teaching Didem Ekici, 2018 With an increasing number of refugees and immigrants in European and American classrooms teachers need to be prepared to meet their varied and complex needs In particular to help these diverse students succeed teachers need to be interculturally competent which is a combination of many skills including attitude linguistic and cultural awareness empathy and flexibility However developing these skills not only takes theoretical knowledge but also hands on training and practice While many programs in school of education provide experiential practicum projects and online collaborations with diverse students they have not expanded to the population in war zones Moreover a review of literature revealed a gap in research on how online tutoring might impact the intercultural competence development of pre service ESL teachers This study attempted to fill that gap by exploring how teaching English online to students in Afghanistan for six weeks impacted the intercultural competence of pre service ESL teachers Ten pre service ESL teachers participated in this study Pre interviews post interviews and five reflection journals during the six weeks comprised the qualitative data The data were analyzed through the lens of the process model of intercultural competence framework by Deardorff 2006a The data which was analyzed categorized verified and interpreted revealed that the preservice ESL teachers developed intercultural competence within a six week period While some pre service ESL teachers expressed their initial discomfort about the unknowns of teaching online face to face the dynamics of interacting with student of a different culture fear of miscommunication and grappling with their own assumptions this discomfort diminished after a few sessions In fact some participants described this experience as eye opening Therefore this study concluded that becoming familiar with the people and practices of a diverse culture in an online environment and for even a short duration helped preservice teachers develop self awareness empathy and linguistic knowledge all factors that helped developed their intercultural competence So it is recommended to integrate online teaching into practicum and international field projects to help build a new generation of interculturally competent and globally minded teachers
